WEDNESDAY MORNING, JULY 8, 1863.

THE SITUATION.

We publish this morning important news from the East and from the West.

Gen. Lee's army in Pentsylvania has met and defeated the army lately commanded by Hooker. The extent of the victory will be developed from hour to hour. At present it appears to be conclusive. We believe it is so

If the dispatches prove correct, Baltimore by this time is in our possession, and the capture of Washington but a question of time.

The news from Vicksburg may, or may not be true. We are inclined to credit it. But only so far as the loss of the place is concerned. We think the garrison has cut its way freely forgive him, his intent. We may say out safely, and joined Gen. Johnston, who had with Pemberton. Before expressing any fival opinion, however, we await further details.

In the event of the truth of our entire dispatches, we take the situation to be full of life and hope, and are entirely comforted for agy disaster on the Mississippi by the great exploits of our great Captain "over the border."

Having from the wisest considerations left Shelbyville and Warirace, it came by slow and easy marches over two different roads, and effected its concentration at this point without being in any way harried er harrassed. From the hour of starting it has been held firmly and securely in hand, protecting its train of several thousand wagons, and marching compactly and with great deliberation, the rear being covered by the cavalrywith whom the enemy had more or less skirm-

We believe it is one of the provisions of the constitution and rules of governing the Press Association, that at all important po'nts, in the Confederacy, a regular Press Reporter shall be stationed. If Chattanooga is not by the recent movements of the Tennessee army made an important point, we should like to know what constitutes the military importance of any point, in the estimation of the Superintendent of the Association. The Press of the South needs a reporter here, and should be immediately attended to.

"The Last of the Mobicans."

"Fighting Joe" has played his last card, and it turns out no trump at all. He made a great bluster, but deceived no one. There was a vague impression resting on everybody's mind that he was not a Napoleon, and time has verifind the popular impression. His day, like that of other dogs, has grown dark before it issued many proclamations and dealt out an extensive measure of bravado, he could not hold out. He has been gathered to the great valtable cloister of the ever-living dead, where Scott and McDowell, Pope, McClellan and Burnside lie in gloomy cerement.

> "Whilst he lived, he lived in clover, When he died, he died all over."

"His usefulness is impaired." The telegram so tells. That is his own opinion; and indeed it is the opinion of all men of sense. He can certainly do his cause no more good, if he ever did it any, which is a matter of extreme doubt. He certainly never did us much harm, and we we feel a sort of sympathy for him. Contempt previously marched to a position connecting almost always brings pity. For the fall of "fighting Joe" is so flat. Never a pancake, or pun was flatter. He is not only "stale, flat and unprofitable," he is perfectly defunct.
